INTRODUCTION

Celebrating the 25th anniversary of the Journal of Management Accounting Research provides an opportunity to consider the past, present, and future of management accounting (MA) research. MA research in the U.S. started in the 1950s in response to the Ford Foundation's efforts to reform and modernize business schools, which included putting more emphasis on rigorous social science research, having faculty be proficient in conducting social science research, and improving doctoral education (Maher 2001). A lot of the initial social-science-based MA research was conducted by nonaccounting faculty because accounting faculty were inexperienced in conducting social science research. Three notable examples of this are two studies sponsored by the ControllerShip Foundation¹—Argyris's (1952) field study of the impact of budgets on people² and Simon, Guetzkow, Kozmetsky, and Tyndall's (1954) field study of how to organize the controller's department—and Stedy's (1960) experimental study of budget goal difficulty.³ MA research is currently produced by accounting faculty who are proficient in doing social science research because accounting now has rigorous doctoral programs focused on social science research methods and theories.

Sixty years after the beginning of MA research, I have the opportunity to evaluate MA research. My evaluation is structured by the three questions that were addressed to the panel:

1. In what MA topics do we have established knowledge?
2. What are some common themes in MA research at the present time?
3. What do we need to learn in MA, going forward?

I thank Jake Binsberg, Bob Cheshall, Elizabeth Connors, Murray Lindsay, and Joan Luth for their very helpful comments on an earlier version of this article.

My article is based on my presentation on the JMAR 25th Anniversary Panel on Management Accounting Research: Knowledge Base, Themes, and Future Directions.

Published Online: February 2015
